strated his own wondrons skill, and the in posal to abolish spring elections as follows.

The only argament in favor of frequent elections is that it is a popular educator. But that will hardly apply to mere local campaigns during which principles are not discussed. Perhaps it may be urged that it is unwise to associate local and general elections, but this is merely a question of elections, but this is merely a question of elections but this is merely a question of distinguished from that which is indifferent, expedience. Allogether the argument is expedience. Altogether the argument is favorable to one election during a year. There is no constitutional difficulty, the legislature having power to regulate the time of election. All elections, therefore, may be held in November if the legislature so enacts. If the local and state elections are held in November, it will be necessary merely to extend the terms of incumbant officials from Apr I to November in order to to acquire what is called a "highly artistic taste" in this direction.
